Refugee Children in Ottoman Cities: Public Order and Philanthropy in the Late Ottoman Empire

Lecture by Prof Dr Nazan Maksudyan (Kemerburgaz University, Istanbul)

In the nineteenth century, the ‘dangerous child’ began to occupy a significant place in international public opinion. There was public anxiety about street urchins, abandoned children, and underage beggars occupying newly expanding urban public spaces. The Ottoman administrators of the 1860s and 70s were convinced that vagrant children and beggars in the streets, who were considered both “in need of protection” and as “abetted into crime” were mostly of refugee origin, who came with the waves after the Crimean and Russo-Ottoman Wars. Children were perceived as a form of threat for the order and security of the cities and their inhabitants. In that respect, the urban space should be cleared off them. Claiming that “a modern state” should both protect children from danger and protect society from dangerous children, there was a compulsive and brutal activity of “child collection” and incarceration in the second half of nineteenth century in major cities of the Empire. Primarily based on the Prime Ministry’s Ottoman Archives, Ottoman Educational and Provincial Yearbooks, French diplomatic archives, and Ottoman press, this paper discusses the late Ottoman state’s approach to the issue of refugees by focusing on both the mechanisms of order and measures of philanthropy targeting children. As a point comparison, the paper touches upon the situation of Armenian refugee children in Istanbul after 1919.
